Let's say we have a Google Account and it has a Calendar: When the app makes a request like Is the OAuth token (etoken: xxxxxxxxxx) necessary to read the events? A: In general, using OAuth is the preferred method of accessing data on the Google API, since: It is designed for secure access to a resource by the developer (user) and all clients of the API. When using OAuth, Google gives an access token and an access token secret, instead of just letting the user provide the credentials needed to access the service. The access token and the access token secret are provided so that Google knows that the requesting application is who it claims to be. What you are asking is not really about OAuth. You are describing normal HTTP request/response behavior. In your case, you probably have a server that can access your data using the OAuth mechanism. For Google, all of their servers 0cc13bf012
